"Federation President, Don Garris, decides that he wants to show off a bull at state convention. The Federation Council agrees. They send Caller Drew to the state fair with a thousand dollars to buy a bull. Along the way, he ran in to a square that needed a caller. So he stopped and called a tip for them.

Drew then resumed his travels to the state fair to bid on a bull. Knowing how badly that Don needed a good bull, Drew was determined to buy the best one he could. He waited until the Grand Champion bull was put up for bidding.

When the bidding was over, Drew won the bidding and had bought the bull for $999. Now Drew was in a pickle. He needed to get back home, but he only had a $1 left. Drew checked his pockets in search of his cell phone only to realize he had forgotten it. So he went to the local Verizon store thinking he could send a text message to Don about his troubles. When he got to the store they could indeed help him with his problem... he could send a text message but it would cost $1 for every word sent. Drew thought for a minute and then realized he only needed one word to get the message thru to Don.
